Occupying a prominent knoll overlooking Wicomico Creek is the Tull farm, an early twentieth-century complex that consists of a large Colonial Revival house as well as a significant complement of support buildings. The squarish two-and-a-half story dwelling, erected in 1918, is distinguished by a Tuscan columned front porch which extends around the west side to include a porte-cochere. Gabled dormers pierce the steeply pitched hip roof to light the third floor, and a pair of brick chimneys rise through the center of the house.

Standing within a close distance of the house are several outbuildings including a pyramidal roofed dairy and a pyramidal roofed generator house. South of the two outbuildings is a gable-front frame carriage house, a mortise-and-tenon frame structure evidently reworked when the other buildings were erected. The tenant house was sited within twenty yards of the carriage house. The single-story dwelling was designed along simplified bungalow style designs. Also sited on the property are two garages, a corn crib, an old dairy barn, and some chicken houses. Built along the farm lane between the main complex and Allen Road are two turn of the century frame tenant houses.
